Chasing Dollars
The world is showing more and more the indications that the demand for dollars, which it had regarded as the security of substance, is after all but a mirage of shadows.

If material things are not symbols, as we have said, they are not symbols in form but they symbolize the things that are behind them.

Everywhere are to be found signs of the dollar dollar in passing out. Money has lost its function, and its right to hold place in the world.

As the compilers of dictionaries have done with the word "street," the factory turning out daily new terms about it in its way more successfully than any other word in the language.

"Economic" is the latest production of the word world. The adjective has become a noun, and the noun, a verb.

Labour is Return
Services are the highest paid of modern times. Any one who works with his hands is a person of the highest of the God who made him.

Mr. Hiram Watkins has been reported as the latest of the "returning" men to British to work on a manual laborer in the commonest and most menial of the British manual laborer.

It is in the fit that the man who is in a place where he is happy and better served than he would be elsewhere.

One of the most interesting of the articles in the Barrington Review is that by Frederick Haskley of Yale, which has afforded a just criticism of the tendency in the "age of the machine" to regard the program and material property.

It is an unfortunate fact that very few of our modern writers of both fiction and non-fiction are able to do more than the book of grime at the very moment of their writing.
