The climate of Cuba (township) is conducive to the raising of small fruits. When two crops of strawberries and two crops of red raspberries are produced in this part of the country, it is a first-class advertisement for northern Illinois. Gaby brought to this office some red raspberries which he picked the day previous from bushes in his garden. A branch from the bush was well-filled with green and half-ripened fruit.

SEEING THE FAIR
IN DETAIL

Brazil and Her Fathomless Forests—A Little Display That Represents More Forests Than All Other Forestry Exhibits at the World's Fair—Brazil's Most Valuable Tree The Rubber Producer—Brazils Wings—Things to See and Buttery Cases—Brazils That Do Remarkable Things in the Way of Tanning—Colonel Aguiar's Esquilate National Palace—The Human Chute of the Brazilian Fire Department—Brazil's Finest Manufacturers of Fire Apparatus.

(SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE BY MARK BENNETT.)
Even so late in the season as this, one is filled with regret that the Palace of Forestry, Fish and Game was not made of rubber, so that Brazil might have had more room. I am sure Brazil could have furnished the rubber. The mention of rubber recalls a young lady's declaration: "Oh, I'm going to rubber and rubber to my heart's content. That's what I pay my 50 cents for." So we are all "rubbers" every where, till our necks protest with lameness.

Brazil! Vast beyond our appreciation! Wonderful beyond our comprehension! If you are losing flesh worrying over the future timber supply, if you are trying awake nights wondering where the succeeding crop will come, if you are going to get cord wood to keep the family sawbuck from annual, just turn to Brazil. The Amazon forests contain 2,000,000 square miles of timber. That is the village newspaper subscriptions still untouched in those billions of trees—and the paper pulp, too, if necessary. It is 700 million square miles. Two times the area of France! Two-thirds the area of the United States!

Here at the world's fair Brazil has a very narrow space—so more than a state allotment—but she was a late comer, and regrets are mutual. The Brazilian forest contains more than 17,000 species. A vast expanse of the Amazon forests is inundated yearly, and it is here that the water loving trees grow in tropical luxuriance and beauty. Open the windows and see the other forests, as old as Mount Ararat perhaps, and containing trees 300 feet high and infinite in variety. As well might you expect a peacock to stride and crow her tresses into a collar box as to expect Brazil to display her woods in this narrow space. But she has made a brave effort and has ornamented it with cases of birds and reptiles and strange things of many sorts.

The tree of greatest value to Brazil and to the world at large is the Bryophora elastica, the tree that produces the India rubber of commerce and of manifold usefulness. Here are some huge round balls of the pure rubber, except for the smoke that has been put into it in the preparation of the material for export. The rubber gatherer prepares a stick, which he dips into the white milk sap of the rubber tree which he has gathered and then holds it in the shade of an outdoor fire to coagulate. The dipping and smoking process goes on till a large ball is formed, and it is ready to ship to market. In 1902 Brazil shipped nearly $37,000,000 worth of raw rubber and imported only $300,000 worth of manufactured rubber products. The immense forests of northern Mato Grosso have not even been explored, and Brazil is able to assure the rest of the world that she has enough rubber for the world's use for a long time to come.

Collectors of butterflies and moths are attracted by the several ornamental collections of these insects. Here is one of the emperor moths ten inches or more from tip to tip and worth $15 in the moth collector's catalogue. Brazil has many brilliant species of butterflies, from the changeable or iridescent blue to the variegated kinds of infinite number. Very curious is the one known as "living leaf" a large insect whose wings are the exact counterparts of tree or bush leaves. Why nature so carefully shields the identity of one insect and makes others so bright as to catch the eye is one of the mysteries of creation. It would take sharp eyes indeed to find a "living leaf" in its natural habitat, for in color and veining the wings are perfect leaves. Huge tarantulas are centrepieces in two collections. Such big fellows are the more deadly, as it seems to be a law of nature that the mature insects and reptiles of the poisonous species are the more to be feared. The bite of such a tarantula would very likely result fatally within a few hours.

Brazil has more kinds of bark than a dog show. Here are eighty-three varieties of bark, roots and woods whose chief value is in their tanning qualities. And with the tanning in the coldest, from a creamy chocolate to a brick red. These bark range in their richness from 20 to 35 per cent tannin, or nearly double the value of oak bark, one of the American tanning agents. Three of the barks are said to produce white leather, extracting from the hide all the coloring matter and depositing none. Another bark, the arara, colors the leather black when tanning it. Other bark produce reds and blues. While tanning agents may become scarce in some parts of the world, the scarcity is only local. The forests of Brazil and other countries of South America are a guarantee of an abundance of tanning material for generations to come.
