Not until one leaves home does he really appreciate his home paper. Distance lends enciantment is truly proven in this case. When a man pults up stakes and shakes the dust of his old home from his shoes to seek pastures new he naturally has a hankering to know what is going on in his old home. It is then he appreciates the home paper that had always made weekly risits to his home, but which he had berestore looked upon as a mere circumstance in the whirippool or life. He weekly visits to hisse who are abroad are like a apring shower upon the parched fields. The movements and actions of those we had left behind is ever of inperest, and we are delighted in reading about our one time neighbors. Truly the home paper is not really appreciated until we get where it is hard to get.
