Feasting and Starving in Japan. Nearly a million people have perished of hunger in Japan during the last year, according to the East Asian, a journal of Berlin, edited by a Japanese. The three provinces of Miyagi, Fukushima and Iwata have been most severely afflicted, and earnest appeals are being made for help. The emperor and empress of Japan as well as many of the most prominent people in social and commercial circles are contributing, but, as the Japan Weekly Chronicle says:

Great as these individual contributions are, they are only sufficient to give very temporary relief to 80,000 persons, the number, we are informed, who are in a condition to starve. Several days ago the public was told that a bill was to be introduced into the diet voting "immediate" relief, a word that will surely be bitter irony to the thousands of unfortunate persons who are now starving and waiting for the assistance that is promised them. It is well for the famine stricken that active relief measures are being undertaken by the local government authorities, by the newspapers of Tokyo and the provinces and by private committees, Japanese and foreign. But we think it of conditions as they are represented to be, that the work of relief is one essentially for the central government, through the local authorities.

According to the same paper, this famine has incidentally revealed a rather sinister element in Japanese national character. There is a good deal of money in Japan at the present time, yet people are not contributing as they might be expected to do to the needs of the three northern prefectures of the Japanese empire. Even the government, no longer national, is accused of neglecting the people. Under the old form of rule such distress as is now reported would have been relieved immediately by shipments of rice and remission of taxes.

The Japanese people are still elated with their victory over the Russians and are ready enough to spend money in celebrating their victory. They are, however, according to the Celestial Empire, an Anglo-Chinese paper printed at Shanghai, inaccessible to the miserable plight in which the northern provinces are lying. This journal says:

On every occasion of demonstration in honor of the heroes, from Togo, who led off, to the last army commander who lay yet to come, there has been a wasteful waste of wine and edibles, a senseless display of riches, flowers and bonfires, that has been simply criminal in the existing conditions. One-fourth of the money that has been used for these demonstrations would have been plenty to give an admiral or a fleet commander the salaries that would have shown satisfactory the kindly feeling and warm appreciation of the people, who would have been hundreds of thousands of yen to use in relieving the poor people who are starving, and many of whom have cheerfully given husband, son, father, brother, to help defend the country's honor. The poor famished people of the northern provinces are far away and are not thought about. It would be almost inhuman to say they are absolutely forgotten, but they are certainly not receiving that personal assistance which must be given or there will be many thousands more to be before the late spring brings normal relief.

Overdoing Athletics.

Just at the season when young folks are getting ready for their outdoor pastimes the warning comes from two physical training authorities that there is a tendency in this country to overdo athletics. Dr. Sargent of Harvard especially warns young women against too strenuous games. Dr. Giddings, speaking before the physical training society of which he is president, laid down the general proposition, "Athletics for recreation, but not for serious public competition."

Dr. Sargent carried his warning to the extreme of putting a ban on foot-ball, boxing, polo vaulting and even basket ball for girls. A judgment certain to be challenged by half the school-girls of the day. Dr. Giddings' limitation of athletics to simple recreation seems to rest upon the sound idea that the combined strain of training for matches and playing in competition makes hard work where mere pastime should be the sole end in view. It is the strain that does the mischief, and straining at play is a waste of good stuff, just the same as using a sledge to drive home a carpet tack.

The London version of that "indies" smoking car story is that a company's management was reserved in a special train for three women, that these women smoked and that they were American returning home. This commonplace innovation was expanded into a scandalous innovation on the part of the railway in establishing a smoking car service for women.
