IN THOSE DAYA AROSE KINGS.
Imagine yourself back two years and a half before Wild Week, back at the time when the kings of mance had just completed their apparently final conguest of the industries of the country, whom the himse of mance had just completed their apparently final conguest of cipidal and brains, when all the governments of the nation—national, state and city—were prostrate under their iron heels. You may remember that I was a not inconspleuous figure then. Of all their financial agents, I was the best-known, the most trusted by them, the most believed in by the people. It had a magnificent entire or will and liroad streets. Boston claimed me size, and Chicago; and in Philadelphia, New Orleans, St. Louis, San Francisco, in the towns and rural districts tributary to the cities, thousands spoke of Blacklock as their trusted adviser in matters of finance, My enemies—and I had then, numerous and remonous enough to prove me a place worth white—my enemies whop gambler in the world.

Gambler I was—like all the other manipulators of the markets. But bucket-shop, I never kept. As the kings of finance were the representatives of the great merchants, manufacturers and investors, so, was it the respectability of the great merchants and the strength of the ill it was in two pieces. He dropped them, one at a time, into the waste banket, then smilled benevolently at me. "You shall have what you want. You shall have what you want. You have seemed such a sure boy to me that, in spite of your giving again and seemed such and you want. You have seemed such as a more boy to me that, in spite of your giving again and the seement was a sure of the seement was a sure of the seement was a sure of the port of the matter over with Langdon and Meiville. Rest saured, my boy, that you will be satisfied." He got up, put his arm affectionately round my shoulders. "We all like you. I have a feeling toward you as if you were my own son. I am getting old, and I like to see young men about me, growing up to assume the responsibilities of the Lord's work wheenever He shall call; me to my reward meredible that a man of my always when we had a traperience could be taken in by such allmy suff at that—the horse work of heart as any empty spider in an empty web. Yet I was taken in to the ertient that I thought he really purposed to recognize my services, to yield to the only persuasion that could' affect himfore. I fanced he was actually the satisfacture, as well as tu myself.

It was with tears in my eyes that I shook hands with him, thanking him and a proud heart that I went back to my offices. There wasn't a doubt in my mind that I was about to get my deserts, was about to enter the charmed circle of "high finance."
