The Letter

Having scrutinized the sheet of note paper carefully the young man laid it down tenderly. He dipped his pen in the ink and tried it on a scrap of paper before he spread his feet apart and hunched over the desk to write. He began:

"Mr. Alwell W. Adkins, New York City, Dear Sir—I wish to bring to your attention a matter which while concerning both of us yet pertains more closely to affairs connected with myself and yet also is perhaps more important to you judging from the standpoint that naturally might have taken into consideration all the facts that—"

The young man suddenly crumpled the sheet and cast it from him, then picked it up again to smooth it out and glare at it.

"Now," he said to himself, "I wonder what I really thought I was saying. I suppose if I had gone on with that I should have ended the sentence with something about picking curcans on the mountains and why I prefer white fish bouillabaisse!"

Selecting another sheet of paper he wrote down the same address and started in again:

"No doubt you will be surprised at a letter from me on this subject, though on second thought the fact that you are not acquainted with me should have nothing to do with it, inasmuch as you have doubtless considered the possibility of circumstances of a present nature about a situation which, while not exactly similar to the one that is bringing your attention, still—"

The young man paused, bit his pen, got up and walked around the room, came back and read over what he had written and then sat down dejectedly. "Oh, that won't do," he groaned. "It simply won't do at all. I know precisely what I am trying to say and it is doggone queer I can't make it come out right. Come to think of it, the start is too businesslike!"

Being a third time he wrote: "My Dear Mr. Adkins—I suppose it would be well to tell you something about myself, because it is in the nature of things that you would wish to know more in fact all about a person who intrudes himself into the midst of the most important part of the daily existence of a circle which while far removed yet seems in a measure united with the hopes and aspirations that at present overpower the more humdrum phases of everyday life that hitherto have occupied the—"

Sinking his head into his hands the writer let his fingers run wittily through his hair. The more he thought the more impossible it seemed to complete the sentence. "It began well, too," he murmured mournfully as he slowly tore the paper in two and added it to the heap in the waste basket.

Then he went and got a drink of water, looked out of the window and opened a book before he once more settled himself at the writing desk. He began slowly, determinedly: "Mr. Alwell W. Adkins, New York City. My Dear Mr. Adkins—Putting the matter briefly, which is best, I wish to say that while I realize no amount of preparation would make any easier the blow—"

"Good gracious, that isn't the word." "The loss that it would be to you if what I am going to say should incline you to look favorably upon the proposition that I feel it is that for me to bring to your attention, still, on the other hand—"

The young man looked fixedly at a figure in the wall paper. Leaning back, he examined the end of the pen, frowning at it. He hummed a little tune. Slowly his eyes wandered back to the paper before him and he shook his lip at it.

"Confound you!" he muttered in tones of concentrated rage. "On the other hand—what is on the other hand, anyway? Not a blamed thing! I've forgotten what I had in mind when I started out—and I started out briefly, too! The inside of my head feels like a patent churn with a hash of dictionary going round and round inside it! You could almost set that to music if you were clever!"

He tore the paper into pieces viciously, got out another sheet, slammed it down, jabbed his pen into the ink and with his damp hair plastering his brow wrote:

"Mr. Alwell W. Adkins, Dear Sir—You don't know me, but I love your daughter and want to marry her. My income is $4,000 a year and below are the names of five persons you can write to for information about me. Your daughter knows I am writing this. Hoping for a favorable reply, I remain, yours truly,

"JOHN L. HEATH."

"That's what I was trying to say all the time!" he jubilated as he dropped the letter down the wall chute.

That's Different. "See here! You wrote a personal letter yesterday during office hours. You used your employer's time. That's stealing."

"Well, sir, I have worked overtime at least one hundred times per year for the past ten years."

"That's honest. That's business."

What Makes a Woman? One hundred and twenty bottles, more or less, of bone and muscle don't make a woman. It's a good foundation, but into it health and strength and she may rule a kingdom. But that's just what Electric Bitters give her. Thousands bless them from overcoming fainting and dizzy spells and for dispelling weakness, nervousness, backache and tired, listless, worn out feeling.

"Electric Bitters have done me a world of good," writes Eliza Paul, Depue, Okla. "and I thank you, with all my heart, for making such a good medicine." Only 50c. Guaranteed by Barrington Pharmacy.

Superior Judgment. "So you suspect that men are quicker of judgment in practical matters than women?" "Yes," replied Miss Cayenne. "Men have headed the warnings of the newspapers and quit buying gold bricks, but women continue to marry for money."

Different Uses. "What does this mean, Sam?" said Judge Brown to the prisoner, producing two razors, one a safety, the other a straight razor. "Lordy, Judge, don't you all know? Dat safety razor fur shavein', sah, but de udder an fur social pavesin' entirely, sah."—Judge.
