In which we live. We never can move where we cannot see "the smoke from our neighbor's chimney." The world has grown so small that a farmer who rises in the middle West will jostle someone in little Europe. We cannot indulge our impulses. In such a world a fire anywhere endangers us all. It can set the whole world on fire.

"Education must contribute in a time like ours to a new understanding of the limitations and costs of force. The growing generation recognizes the limitations inherent in force. In any physical contest a boy eventually overcomes his father. Understanding and cooperation are necessary for a sound relation between father and son. So it is between nations. Force is costly and deadly. It never settles a question. The United States entered the war to establish her right to trade as she wanted to, but this problem is not settled yet. Strength does not settle problems. The cost is so great that anyone loses. Education must show us the limitations of force
