Look for Spring Flowers Now and Enjoy the Season

List of W.F.P.S. Out Each Season

In the second of a series of articles sent to The Review by officers of the state Wild Flower preservation society, of which Mrs. Robert Work is a member of the official board and Miss Edith Dymond an officer, the writer runs through the gamut of favorite flowers, typical of each season of the year.

"To a nature lover, a season is distinguished by the flowers and birds that appear and abound at that time. Especially a nature lover watches each wild flower as it comes above the ground. Our earliest spring flower, although it has an ugly name, is, on close examination, really beautiful. The skunk cabbage blossom comes up late in February or early March, long before its leaves appear, and it is the blossom that is interesting, enveloped by a spathe which is shell shaped, pinkish veined with purple. Really, the name says it all. It is being referred to as much as it might be. By the time the large leaves have appeared the blossoms have withered, and the seeds have dropped into the ground almost like little balloons. By this time the robin has come and built his nest.

The next flower to appear is the dogwood, a general favorite. If we poke among dried leaves in the woods, we shall see the first shoots of this lovely flower, belonging to the croquet family, with six or sometimes more pinkish white sepals, often mistaken for petals, with numerous stamens and pistils and of delicate fragrance. The leaves are green, mottled with purple, and are evergreen. Another early comer is the blood-root, the white flower of which with its eight or more petals, is carefully safeguarded around by the petaloid shaped leaf from which as it unfolds the blossom emerges.

Many persons if asked for their choice of the May flowers would say, without hesitation, the Arbutus. It is an extremely early flower, blossoming under the leaves which are evergreen. It is followed by the Spring Beauty, a small pinkish white flower growing in lower wooded places. It is similar to the Anemone, or, as it is sometimes called, the Wind Flower, which is also white with four or seven petals like sepals, and no sepals. The leaves are from the base and also on the flower stem whorled below the leaves and divided into five toothed leaflets. Another little flower to make its appearance early in the season is the False Lily of the Valley, perhaps from its leaves. Then follow the other two belonging to the Lily of the Valley family, the False Solomon's Seal or Spikenard, which white
