Lotus Plants Now in Bloom at Grass Lake a Rare Sight

China, Japan, and Australia. This oriental lotus is often cultivated now as in the past, when the ancient peoples held it in reverence and made frequent use of it in the ornamentation of temples and of personal belongings. It has been naturalized in ponds about Bordenstown, N. J.

According to Britton and Brown, our species may be found growing at Grass Lake, Ontario, in the Connecticut river near Lyme; in Swartswood lake, northern New Jersey; formerly in the Delaware river, north of Philadelphia; and locally south of and in Louisiana.

Britton and Brown knew the eastern territory better than the westerner, so let us see what some of the botanists who live about Chicago have to tell us.

In 1927, The Chicago Academy of Sciences published H. S. Peopoo's "Flora of the Chicago Region," noting that the title does not read "Flora of Chicago."

This book lists Nelumbo lutea as growing at "Calumet, Clark, Indiana, rare, Calumet, Lake, Abundant northwest of Chicago in some sections of the Foxlake region as Grass Lake. A small colony in Wolf Lake, Indiana." Some of these colonies were apparently in danger of extinction.

In 1920 The Field Museum of Natural History published a "Flora of the Indiana Dunes," written by Donald Peattie. Here we read, "A magnificent species which has been nearly exterminated by picking. It grew formerly in Wolfe lake and is still found in the waters of the Grand Calumet."

Going farther from Chicago, Conway MacMillan's unusually fine work, "Minnesota Plant Life," published in 1929, calls this plant the Indian lotus, and says "it belongs to the same genus in which the famous lotus of the Nile and the Orient is classified. The true oriental lotus is also known in the east as the Indian lotus because of its growth in India. Such a fact is illustrative of the confusion that sometimes arises when only popular names are employed in the designation of plants."

MacMillan calls the lotus "the largest-flowered and most interesting of the native water-lilies—not very far from a few localities, and confined to a few localities. It occurs in the Mississippi river at Red Wing, Mendota and LaCrosse; also in Lake Pepin and in Lake Minnetonka. He says it is called "rattlebush" in some localities, because the seeds rattle in the peculiarly shaped receptacle when it is shaken."

Gray's New Manual of Botany, seventh Edition, calls our lotus the "Yellow Nelumbo or the Water Chinquapin." Localities in Massachusetts, southern Connecticut, Lake Ontario, Lake Erie, Michigan, Minnesota, eastern Nebraska, and southward, are noted.

The lotus native to Egypt was a blue and white water-lily which was used in decoration and for garlands. The Indian lotus (Nelumbo Nelumbo) introduced into the country, was held sacred to Ostris and to Isis, a symbol of the recurring fertility of the land by the Nile, and hence, probably, of immortality.

by Mercer, Mrs. Jerome Haugen and Miss Elizabeth VanHagen.

The new pool is 20 by 60 feet and has been built at the west side of the club house. A miniature sand beach has been constructed at one side of the pool and a beautiful flower garden at the other. Water at the pool will be purified every 24 hours.

The lotus sometimes grows in water six feet deep. In 1924 floods came in late June after the lotus had reached its usual height. The plants were submerged for weeks. Low water during the following winter allowed the roots to freeze. It was feared that the beds would never recover their former extent and beauty, but within the past three or four years they have rapidly increased to their present starting level.

Mr. Peattie says that the first day the lotus flowers are open only from dawn until sunrise. The second and third days they remain open longer, and by the fourth day they stay open till dusk, when the petals drop off. The flowers are sometimes as much as ten inches across.

The receptacle in which the seeds form rises in the center of the flower in a sort of top-shaped structure, honey-combed on its upper surface. This becomes more conspicuous when the petals have fallen off, float away, head downward, and decay sets free the large black seeds which sink to the bottom. They are believed to require a long time for germination, a long period of dormancy.

The lotus of Greek literature was a quite different plant, either native to southern Europe or the fruits of which were used for making bread and also a fermented drink, or else a species of clover.

Girl Is Killed in Three Car Crash

then returned onto the pavement before striking the third car, driven by Mr. Sheppard—an occurrence which barely possible, Schultz and his mother also testified that Ackmann ran over to their car immediately after the accident and cried out that he must have fallen asleep. Ackmann's car was approaching a left curve before the accident, so that if the accident occurred as Schultz described it, Ackmann must have turned his wheel very sharply to negotiate the left curve and in addition crossed the highway from right to left. Ackmann testified that he did not cross the highway in front of the other car. He said he was driving partly in the first lane and partly in the second on the right side of the center line prior to the accident. He denied the accusation that he had fallen asleep.

An attorney at the Inquest representing Ackmann, pointed out that if the accident had occurred as Schultz described it, the Ackmann car would have been hurled into the open field south of the highway after striking the Schultz coupe. However, it did not do that but went down the highway where it struck the Sheppard car. He expressed doubt that the collision occurred on the south side (Schultz's right hand side) of the highway. There were no eyewitnesses of the accident except the occupants of the automobiles.

M. B. Bowman to Represent Insurance Company at Rockford; Family Moves

Mr. and Mrs. M. B. Bowman, formerly of 642 Grove avenue, have moved to 2308 Melrose street, Rockford, where Mr. Bowman will represent the Connecticut General Life Insurance company with whom he had been connected here for the past six months. Their daughter Helen is spending the summer with her grandparents at Lake Waukegan and will return to Rockford at the opening of school.

Mrs. Bowman had been a patient at the Sherman hospital, Elgin, for the past two weeks, having undergone a major operation recently, but was able to make a trip to Rockford with her husband Tuesday. Her condition was reported to be greatly improved.
