Daring Piece of Engineering
The great International Bridge at Niagara Falls was a daring piece of engineering. The span was 821 feet, and the height of the towers 88 feet. It was the first suspension bridge designed to carry railroad traffic. And it was only because locomotives were being built so much heavier that it had to be replaced by a steel arch in 1928.

Blood Exposed to Air
It has been estimated that the amount of lung surface in which the blood is exposed to air measures about 2,000 square feet.
